I am a grounded adventurer. You're wondering what that is or if that even exists? Well, let me explain...

My first real adventure was doing a study abroad during my junior year of highschool. I went to a boarding school in Florida. Thinking I was fluent in English (I had straight As), I was soon met by reality. I did not understand a single person as I was only used to German and if at all British accents. Luckily, I met Amy, who is still one of my dearest friends. Being from Canada, she was the only person I understood during the first few weeks and she helped my get used to other accents and ultimately is the reason why I speak fluent English today. Six months after getting back home to Germany, my family moved within Germany. This might not sound like much of an adventure compared to studying on a different continent, but I moved to Bavaria and in a way, this is almost like a different continent.

After having mastered that adventure as well, I was hooked. I studied abroad in New Zealand, did an internship in China and Italy (I speak neither Chinese nor Italian) and got my Master degree at Boston University.

During an internship at Volkswagen, I met my husband and in 2017 we decided to embark on the adventure of marriage together. Our joined adventure took us to NYC for a couple of years. We've been back in Munich since 2020 and started the biggest adventure to date - being parents to two girls.

But why do I describe myself as a grounded adventurer? While I always loved travelling and being open and spontaneous, I also need my foundation that grounds me. Every now and then I need this cosy feeling of being home or being around things or people that I've known my whole life. No matter where I was, I've always made my own German pretzels, Gluhwein and listened to some German kids songs that I grew up with. I generally love everything around Christmas and Weddings and any sort of celebration.

Thanks to this solid foundation I always know what's really important. And the most important part of a wedding are the bride and groom! I will guide you through the process of planning your ceremony, always making sure that it is your very unique ceremony.

My speech will re-tell your love story and be your foundation for all your future adventures together.

Are you ready to go on an adventure with me?
